economies between 1990-2010, the relation between income inequality and economic systems was introduced to the attendants in the section. Attendants were interested in the issue and they asked questions to learn about the theme further.

In transition economies, as of the empirical results of the paper, the deterioration in the political rights of individuals leads to increase in income inequality, while otherwise for the civil freedoms. The common result of the three estimated models in the study, it is contemplated that if transition economies improve the rights of individuals, the income distribution could be transformed to a fairer one. In addition, it is expected that a rise in the annual growth rate of transition economies positively affect the income inequality.
